

I am writing you to express my concern regarding a proposal by the FCC to expand the service of Low Power FM (LPFM) stations. My primary concern is that the LPFM stations will be able to take priority over current FM translator service. Specifically, my family is quite concerned that these LPFM stations would eliminate the K-LOVE stations that are vital to us and our community. While it is extremely difficult to find a family friendly station on the radio, the K-LOVE network (broadcast on 91.3 FM in San Antonio) provides a positive message for families in our community. It's comforting knowing that a station exists that we can play around our children without the threat of inappropriate language or comments being made. Our five-year old will not listen to any other station on the radio. We believe that K-LOVE is vital to communities throughout the United States. There is no guarantee that LPFM stations would provide appropriate content for families or even relevant content for areas in which they serve. The positive message provided by K-LOVE faces the frightening possibility of being replaced by the same filth that can be found across most of the radio dial. Without the service provided by K-LOVE, thousands of U.S. citizens could be left without anything positive to listen to on the FM dial.

Sincerely,

Michael & Heather Popp
